Build in public

The rules my 8 agents work by.
One approve button, ten rules.

I run go-to-market for Customermates alone with eight agents: Inbox, Signals, Pipeline, Customers, Scout, SEO, Content and Delivery. These are the rules that made their work trustworthy. Most of them exist because something broke.

1 One job per agent, one owner per topic.
If a message belongs to another agent, it is handed over, never answered twice.

2 Only one agent sends.
The others draft. Delivery sends exactly what was approved, nothing else.

3 Anything new to a person waits for my OK.
First messages, introductions, public posts. Routine replies follow rules I signed off once.

4 Keep the approve list short.
When it grows, the fix is a sharper rule, never approving faster.

5 Dates must be real.
A deadline, a promise or today. Never an invented date to make a queue look tidy.

6 Log only after checking.
Every event is read back from the source before it becomes a row in the Work log.

7 Nothing open without a next step.
Every open conversation has one next step with a real date.

8 Every message ends in one state.
A reply sent, an open Action with a date, or closed with a reason. Checked every 24 hours.

9 No self-made limits.
Work runs to completion. The only limits are approval, money and platform rules.

10 Everything lives on the customer record.
Emails, LinkedIn messages, Actions and log rows sit in one CRM, so every approval has its context.

Ben Wagner · Founder, Customermates · customermates.com